

5 Whys – Why is planning group trips so frustrating?

Problem:

Planning trips with a group of friends often turns out to be chaotic, frustrating, and time-consuming.

1. Why is it frustrating?

→ Because it's hard to bring everyone's preferences, availability, and budgets together.

2. Why is it hard to align preferences, dates, and costs?

→ Because every group member has different ideas and priorities – and people usually plan across different channels like WhatsApp, voice notes, or messy spreadsheets.

3. Why is the communication so scattered?

→ Because there's no single platform where the whole group can easily vote, coordinate, and plan everything together in one place.

4. Why isn't there one platform that handles everything?

→ There are several tools out there like Booking.com, Layla, TripPlanner.ai, or Troupe. But each of them only covers one part of the process.
For example:

- Booking.com is great for booking,
- Layla for getting inspired,
- TripPlanner.ai helps with planning,
- and Troupe focuses on group polls.

But none of them offer a complete solution that covers inspiration, voting, budgeting, and booking in one app, especially not for groups.

5. Why are most tools focused on individuals?

→ Because the travel industry has mostly been built around solo bookings and fast transactions.

Even though platforms like Instagram or Layla give travel ideas, they don't really help people go from inspiration to action, especially not in a group.

Planning trips in groups is more complex and most platforms have avoided tackling that challenge.

Conclusion:

Travi solves exactly this gap. It's a platform built for group travel – combining inspiration, planning, voting, coordination, and budgeting in one place.

It's designed to make group trips actually happen, without the usual chaos.
